

The Fry Family Food Co. grows distribution abroad

With the demand for meat-alternatives greater than ever, South African vegan food business The Fry Family Food Co. is experiencing impressive uptake abroad of their range of chilled plant-based products.

Fry family

Based in Durban and family run, The Fry Family Food Co. has been making meat-free, non-GM products for almost three decades, selling more than 30-million units worldwide thus far. While it has enjoyed success in the Australian and European markets, the growing global demand for meat-free alternatives has seen the company's international market demand increase dramatically.

To keep up with demand, Fry's is increasing distribution of their portfolio to more than 8,000 supermarkets, specialty and chain stores in 30 countries. This increase in distribution includes the new relationship with Sainsbury's in the UK, Costco in Australia and the opening of the US as a new market for the brand.

Fry family celebrates 25 years of vegan food manufacturing

13 Mar 2017

"Reflecting rapid demand growth in the United States and sustained interest from international markets, we've taken steps to significantly increase our production capacity," said Fry's exports director Shaun Richardson. "These additions make it possible for us to support international launches, building on our recent introduction of our products to Sainsbury's and Costco."

The brand's products rolled out in over 500 Sainsbury's stores from 11 October. Eight chilled products were launched initially, with a further selection of frozen products making their way to the shelves in November.

In August this year, Costco in Australia started selling the Fry's Traditional Burger as their first ever plant-based meat product. Costco is a multinational membership-based wholesale chain.

To meet the wholesale demand, Fry's specially packaged a 1,5kg, 15-pack of its Traditional Burger product which is being sold at AU$14.59 – making its price point on par with similar meat-based beef products.

For more, visit: <https://www.bizcommunity.com>